International Fellows Class of 2015 to number 80

When the Army War College resident Class of 2015 begins in August, it will include 80 international officers from almost as many countries. Nations invited by the U.S. Government for participation in the Army's senior education have selected the senior officers who will complete the 11-months resident course.

International officers are referred to as International Fellows because of their dual role to study and to add their experiences and perspectives to the senior U.S. military officers attending alongside them.

Twenty-eight International Fellows are taking part in the academic preparation course that started this week. The 10-week course is designed to prepare the international officer for the academic requirements of the year.

All international officers will report to Carlisle by June 20, so as to participate in an IF orientation course. The six-week introductory series will include orientation to the Army War College, to Carlisle and southcentral Pennsylvania. On-site visits, classes and workshops will present a broad spectrum view of the United States and its institutions, to include banking, media, driver's licensing, health insurance, and family members' requirements, such as schools, and more.
