Army War College Students brief high school delegates during Model United Nations Conference

Feb. 20, 2015 -- Five Army War College students lent support and knowledge to the Model UN Conference at Penn State University-Harrisburg today. More than 250 high school students from across the region are taking part in the mock Model UN proceedings at the PSU campus this weekend.

Marine Lt. Col. Brian Sharp walks through the student group while providing a briefing on ISIS to high school students in the Model UN Conference.

USAWC students Marine Lt. Col. Brian Sharp, Army Col. Arthur Adleman, Army Col. Kevin Wolfla, Army Lt. Col. Wilson Ramos led one-hour sessions with extended question-and-answer opportunities for the informed high school students.

Col. Kevin Wolfla shares his expertise on China.

The War College students drew on their studies at Carlisle to address these topics: ISIS, Boko Haram, China, Human Rights, and Russia-and-US, at the request of PSU-Harrisburg, which sponsors the Model UN Conference.

Lt. Col. Wilson Ramos addresses the U.S. position and global considerations related to Human Rights.

Model UN is an extracurricular activity for which students study to prepare to role-play delegates to a mock session of the United Nations and UN committees.

Students represent the positions and values of their assigned countries, adhering to official protocols when speaking, negotiating, and drafting resolutions. Consensus is important and the process of arriving at innovative solutions to global problems is the goal, according to Model UN literature.

Lt. Col. David Casey takes one of many questions about today's Russia-US relationship from the Model UN students.

Army War College students respond, on a voluntary basis, to requests from high schools, colleges, businesses, and community groups to share their personal experiences and knowledge from their graduate work at The War College. The educational mission takes priority; students seek opportunities to volunteer when schedules permit. Request a speaker at <http://www.carlisle.army.mil/speakers.htm>
